This study aims to fill gaps in the extant literature related to whether higher levels of cancer directed therapy, steroid use, cancer-directed treatment consequences, environmental factors, and psychosocial factors are predictive of EDS in pediatric and adolescent and young adult brain tumor patients and survivors. This study will also design a protocol for screening these patients for EDS and providing referral for further evaluation by Sleep Medicine. EDS is estimated to occur in 20-30% of youth with brain tumor, while in certain brain tumor diagnoses, rates of EDS were noted as high as 82%. These sleep problems place youth with brain cancer at increased risk for depression, anxiety, reduced quality of life, fatigue, poor cognitive functioning, and greater physical health problems.

Chimeric Antigen Receptor T (CAR-T) cell therapy has been shown to be a very effective treatment for high-risk pediatric acute lymphoblastic leukemia, but many patients will have recurrence of their disease within one year of the therapy. The lack of long-term persistence of CAR-T cells in patients appear to be a significant factor for its failure. ULRF hypothesize that using a T cell subset with properties of stemness and longevity as the starting material for CAR-T cell production will enhance the anti-leukemia potential and persistence of CAR-T cells. ULRF propose to test this hypothesis by producing CAR-T cells using input T cells selected for markers of early T cell development and compare the anti-leukemia potential and persistence of these CAR-T cell products in a novel mouse model of leukemia re-challenge. This project should lead to the development of new and more effective CAR-T therapies against high-risk pediatric malignancies.
